As the 45 OH moved through Tennessee with General Schoffield, Blair jotted short notes in his journal along the way.

November 22: “Arrive at Pulaski camp, are ordered to be ready to move at noon. Move out and wait for train to go in front. March most of the night.”

November 23: “Move deliberately, black refugees are abundant.”

November 24: “Arrive at Columbia late at night and bivouac. Co. D stand picket in cornfield.”

November 25: “Move to position on left and build good works. At dark we move off to right on stony hill and build works of stone and logs, etc.”

November 26: “Strengthen works and have rain. Attack on left.”

November 27: “Remain in works and draw clothing and at dark withdraw from works. Cross river and bivouac in meadow. Co. D swing round like gate to let column pass on rear to camp.”

November 28: “Move round to position in sight of fort across in Columbia and remain while artillery plies heavily. At dark move out to rear, are stopped by bridge being gone. Came up on flat to left of road. Lie near wagon train till P.M. then move off to right of road and whole brigade form skirmish line along bank of creek. Remain until away in night then move out and march rapidly towards Spring Hill and have to pass along the pike within a few hundred yards of rebel fires and camp. They having come very near gaining the pike and so cutting us off entirely. We bivouac an hour or two.”

November 30: The 45 OH Infantry was situated on the western flank at the Battle of Franklin.

“The heaviest assaults did not reach to the 45th and so we endured the wailing of comparatively few and well spent missiles.....all came off safely without much trouble and after all were safely over the river the artillery that had taken position to support the withdraw fired then a long, loud, heavy, rolling volley for parting salute and all marched off quietly and briskly enroute for Nashville...then we spent the rest of the night marching towards Nashville and a sleepy march it was. Many dropped over asleep on the march and sleep with fatigue overpowered almost every one

December 17: After the Battle of Nashville, David and his regiment were following the U.S. Cavalry in support on the pursuit of John Bell Hood's army.

“Our cavalry takes the advance in the pike and we follow up in their support. The pursuit via Columbia and Pulaski thence across woods and to Lexington, Ala as rapidly as possible under very unfavorable circumstances. The weather very cold, wet and disagreeable. The mud deep and almost impassable. Rations scarce and supply trains constantly far behind etc. etc. The roads are strewn with guns, bayonets, cartridges, boxes, clothing, or rather rags and all kinds of equipage and martial accouterments, ammunition, cassions, artillery, etc. and prisoners are constantly being sent back by the cavalry." (All journal entries from: Civil War Diary and Letters of David Humphrey Blair, compiled by Raymond R. Parker, February 1989)
